Contingent legal risks come in a broad and diverse variety of forms, but share the common theme that they must be risks that are capable of legal analysis and evaluation.

CLRI policies are often used to transfer risk that would otherwise block a transaction.

Contingent legal risks may, and often do, arise in the context of an M&A transaction but they may also be stand-alone risks with no connection to a deal. When used on a deal, Contingent Legal Risk Insurance (CLRI) may be used in conjunction with R&W/W&I (Representations and Warranties/Warranty and Indemnity) policies and is often used to cover a known risk that is excluded from cover under the R&W/W&I policy, and which may otherwise block a deal if neither the buyer nor the seller is willing to bear that risk. The fundamental distinction between CLRI policies and R&W/W&I policies is that, like Tax Liability Insurance policies, CLRI policies cover known legal risks whereas R&W/W&I policies are designed to cover unknown risks.

How CLRI can help

CLRI is designed to respond to our clients' requirements to de-risk one-off identified issues (by transferring them to an insurer) and can be used in a wide range of circumstances. Most commonly, CLRI policies are used to transfer legal risks that might otherwise prevent or adversely affect a range of transactions, including M&A deals, or which might result in one party bearing a greater exposure to that risk than they are commercially comfortable with.

Each CLRI policy is unique and tailored to the specific facts of the risk to be insured. The Liberty GTS CLRI underwriting team will focus on the facts, the legal analysis, and the commercial context that shape and inform the risk in question, in order to provide bespoke policy coverage that meets our clients' requirements.

For example

CLRI policies can be structured to contain a loss payee clause for the benefit of the lenders to the insured, which is helpful when the loss to be covered is the repayment of bank debt taken out by the insured that would be triggered by the occurrence of the insured trigger event.

Which types of legal issues can be covered?

Contingent legal risks are typically low probability but high severity. Policies can be structured to cover: loss incurred as a result of the crystallization of a legal, judicial, administrative, regulatory, or legislative risk; an unexpected interpretation of a contractual provision; or the risk of a judgment or an arbitral award in favor of the insured being overturned on appeal.

Examples of the types of risks that may be covered by CLRI policies include:

- The risk of a regulatory body determining that a business has been operating without the necessary permits or licenses or that it has been operating in breach of their terms
- The risk of a court judgment or an arbitral award in favor of the insured being overturned on appeal or its quantum being reduced below a certain threshold
- The risk of an adverse interpretation of a law or regulation, which could impact a business' contractual entitlement to payment
- Legacy deal liabilities that could prevent the liquidation of a private equity fund
- Contingent liabilities to creditors that might make a security trustee unwilling to distribute insolvency proceeds
- The risk of a court or arbitral tribunal making a higher-than-anticipated damages award in favor of a claimant, against the insured
- The risk and uncertainty flowing from counterparties' differing interpretations of contract terms

Contingent legal risks tend to be low probability but high severity.

What can make a contingent legal risk insurable?

A legal opinion from a reputable law firm with expertise in the subject matter of the risk in question which:

1. Sets out the factual background
2. Analyzes the applicable law and/or regulation
3. Details the loss that may be suffered should the risk crystallize
4. Reaches a clear and quantified conclusion as to the likelihood of the risk crystallizing

A risk is also much more likely to be suitable for a CLRI policy if the insured can demonstrate a clear commercial rationale for seeking to insure the risk (such as unlocking an impasse in deal negotiations).

Case study 1

Reclassification risk in the renewables sector

CLRI coverage unlocks negotiations by removing potential risk that two solar plants could be reclassified as one.

An investor in the renewable energy sector in Southern Europe was in the process of an M&A transaction to acquire two solar plants which had been classified as separate plants for the purpose of the regional regulatory law. This impacted the level of income they could be expected to generate.

The investor's due diligence identified the risk that the solar plants could be reclassified as a single plant by the competent regulatory body because, while separate installations, they were in close proximity to each other.

Such a reclassification would have resulted in a potential liability to repay the historic Specific Regulated Remuneration (SRR) and/or the refusal of future SRR payments.

There were good technical and legal grounds to support the position that the solar plants should not be classified as a group of facilities as defined by the regional regulatory law. Nonetheless, the potential severity of the risk in terms of quantum created an intolerable level of uncertainty for the investor, which was therefore considering abandoning the project.

The investor took out a CLRI policy to cover the loss that it could have suffered in the event of a reclassification of the two solar plants. This took the risk off the table and enabled the parties to unlock the negotiations and proceed with the signing of the transaction within the timeline initially agreed.

Transferring the risk of catastrophic loss scenarios

Amidst drawn-out litigation, CLRI coverage allows a company to secure critical financing.

A European company was involved in a long-running dispute. The first instance judgment, which was favorable to the company, was reversed on appeal. The company received permission to appeal to the final appellate court, but it was possible that the conclusion of the litigation could still take several years.

The company was in the process of a public market equity fundraising to secure investment to finance the ongoing development of its business. While its balance sheet was strong enough to meet the anticipated damages award in the event of an adverse court decision, there was still a remote but not implausible risk that the amount of damages awarded could be materially higher than that anticipated worst-case scenario. The company had a robust legal opinion that supported its analysis.

The company took out a CLRI policy to cover the loss that it could have suffered in the event of a genuinely catastrophic outcome. Not only did this ring-fence the liability to a manageable amount from the company's perspective, but it allowed the company to demonstrate to its potential investors that the liability had been capped, and the catastrophic down-side litigation risk removed, which assisted the company in concluding a successful fundraising.

Court preservation of an arbitration award

CLRI coverage frees up funds for a company, despite ongoing arbitration.

A company was awarded significant damages at arbitration following a dispute with its counterparty to a long-term commercial contract, which was found by the arbitral panel to have been wrongfully terminated by the counterparty. The counterparty lodged an appeal in the local court of first instance (an appeal to a further arbitral panel was not possible).

Pursuant to a written decision, that court confirmed the arbitration award. The counterparty then filed a further notice of appeal with the competent appellate court. The company, having received the damages from the original arbitral award, wished to find a means to allow it to deploy those funds for business purposes elsewhere in its group as the ultimate decision of the appellate court was likely to take years.

Its solution to this problem was to purchase a CLRI policy which covered it against the risk of being required to repay the arbitral award by an adverse appellate court judgment. The policy gave it the necessary protection to free up those funds for use in its business.

Case study 4

Building permit challenged

CLRI policy bridges a financing impasse, allowing a development project to continue despite a court challenge.

A building permit had been awarded to a renewable energy group authorizing the construction of a wind farm in France. During the construction phase, the building permit was challenged in the French administrative court by a group of local citizens opposed to the development seeking an order for the building works to be terminated and the demolition of the completed turbines.

As a result, the banks financing the project were unwilling to release the funds required to complete the construction works until the administrative court had issued a binding decision which, given the protracted court timetable, would result in significant delay to the completion of the project from the operator's perspective.

The developer took out a CLRI policy which resolved this impasse and gave the financing banks sufficient comfort to release further funds to enable construction to recommence. The policy covered the developer for the loss that it would have suffered had the administrative court issued a binding decision revoking the building permit. This would have triggered repayment of the bank financing at a time when the developer would not have been generating any revenue to enable it to fund this debt. While taken out by the developer, the policy was structured to contain a loss payee clause for the benefit of the lenders.

Judgment preservation insurance (JPI): how to monetize a judgment award

A U.S. claimant company obtained a significant damages award in a judgment given by a U.S. district court in a patent dispute. After a bench trial of several weeks, the court in its in-depth opinion, determined that the defendant had wilfully infringed multiple valid patents. In addition to awarding enhanced past damages, the court ordered significant ongoing royalties for the future use of those patents. The defendant then lodged an appeal with the competent U.S. appellate court.

The claimant was confident that it would ultimately succeed in the appeal process and sought a solution that would enable it to monetize the award now rather than wait for a final determination in court, which could take several years.

The claimant took out a judgment preservation policy structured so that, in the event the defendant succeeded in reducing the damages award on appeal beneath an agreed floor value, the policy would reimburse the claimant for the difference between any such reduced award and that floor value.

From an insurer's perspective the risk was a strong candidate for a JPI policy as, with a detailed first instance opinion and full appellate briefing available for review, underwriters and their advisors had the benefit of high-quality materials to enable them to assess the merits of the case.

With the JPI policy in place, the claimant was able to monetize the award by obtaining debt financing on favorable terms, secured against the floor value provided by the JPI policy, and so achieved its commercial objectives of using the award to expand its core operations and pursue its growth strategies.

A JPI policy can be used in a wide variety of cases (including patent infringement, breach of contract, international arbitration, and business torts to name a few) and to preserve a wide range of damages awards (from $5 million to $1 billion).

Using insurance solutions to release trapped cash

CLRI coverage enables the secure release of trapped cash by transferring the risk of potential residual liability.

In a wide variety of different situations, significant amounts of cash can become trapped within a corporate structure, with the person controlling the release of the funds being reluctant to take the risk of making or approving a release to a party or parties petitioning them to do so. Very often this is because of a fear of exposing themselves to potential liability to third parties, typically with a competing claim to the funds in question.

Consider the following common scenarios which illustrate how CLRI policies may be used to break a deadlock to enable the release of trapped cash.

Scenario 1: An insolvent entity is controlled by insolvency practitioners (IPs). Having completed the collection of cash and/or assets, the IPs express reservations about proceeding with the distribution of proceeds to the secured creditors due to the risk of claims from unsecured creditors and/or undeclared creditors, which may have an interest in the estate. Placing a CLRI insurance policy in favor of the IPs and/or the secured creditors could help alleviate tensions between (i) the IPs who may be reluctant to disburse funds if they feel there are potential competing claims due to their statutory duties to all creditors; and (ii) the secured creditors who are legally entitled to receive their proceeds in priority and in a timely manner.

Scenario 2: A fund or a corporate group owns a solvent entity, which it intends to wind-up having extracted the cash and other assets held by it and transferred them to those persons entitled to receive them. The winding-up process entails a number of legal steps, which must be correctly performed before the liquidation can take place. There is a low risk that on or after completion of the winding-up process claims may arise in the medium to long term (depending on the applicable statute of limitations) which can lead to a reluctance to proceed with the winding-up. CLRI insurance can facilitate the winding-up of structures, which may have been dormant for years, by transferring the risk of potential claims from the stakeholders involved (e.g., the directors and/or shareholders of the entity in question, any IPs and any other recipient(s) of the extracted assets) to the insurer.

With many companies and corporate groups focused on maximizing the value of all assets on their balance sheets, using CLRI policies to facilitate the release of trapped cash can be a valuable tool in achieving this aim.

Capacity and claims handling

We are able to deploy limits of up to USD $165M on CLRI policies.
